GPA

Most law schools do not require minimum grade point averages. However, they do publish statistics regarding the GPAs of their incoming students in order to allow applicants to evaluate the competitiveness of the admissions process at a particular institution.

CAS computes its own grade point averages based on an applicant’s undergraduate transcript and CAS’s own scaling system. CAS reports GPA distribution for all applicants by undergraduate institution. This allows the law schools to evaluate in the context of the institution from which it was earned, and the individual course of study taken by the applicant.
